PROPOSAL

TITLE – Post Capture Survival Rate and Reproductive Biology of Vulnerable Shark and Ray Species

NAME OF THE STUDENT – Shruthi Kottillil

REGISTRATION NUMBER – 1800206MSE

NAME OF THE INTERNAL SUPERVISOR

INTRODUCTION AND RATIONAL WITH MAP OF STUDY LOCATION

Shark and ray species are the most poorly studied genus of organisms especially in India in spite of the fact that are ecologically, economically and culturally important. Many of the species of class Chondrichthyans are poorly known and one quarter are estimated to be threatened with extinction (WCS). It is found that more than 50 species of sharks, rays and chimaeras in Arabian Sea are at elevated risk of extinction due to coastal development, overfishing, pollution and habitat destruction (Learn, 2018). The main threat to them all over the world is that they get caught as bycatch in fisheries that are involved in catching other commercially important species. The commercial exploitation of shark for their meat, oil and other products is also a major factor. According to a 2015 report by Central Marine Fisheries Research Institute (CMFRI), India is the second largest shark fishing nation in the world after Indonesia (Sridharan, 2018). The decision to discard or retain a species or individual, however varies, within and between fisheries as it is based on economic or fishers' personal considerations (Hall et al., 2000). The annual global discards from 1998 to 2001 was estimated at 7.3 million tonnes with large uncertainty changes (Kelleher, 2005).

The fishing gears prove to be a threat for their survival and thus it becomes necessary to study their impacts on various species of shark and rays. Some of the common technique used in the study location of Malvan, Maharashtra are trawl nets, gill nets and several other artisanal nets. Studying their post capture survival rate and reproductive biology will help understand how these animals cope with getting caught in fishing gear and if are any reproductive reasons for their vulnerability. Post capture survival rates help understand the effects of bycatch and if these species would be able to survive any subsequent release into the wild.

Shruthi Kottillil

Reproductive cycles can play a major role in the movement of these species and therefore they might have increased vulnerability to getting caught in fishing gears. The breeding cycle generally last from around February to June. Some of the species found have been given IUCN categories - Graceful shark (Near Threatened), Grey Bamboo Shark (Near Threatened), Arabian Carpet shark (Near Threatened), Bull shark (Near Threatened) etc while some of the ray species include White spotted whiplay (Vulnerable), Blue spotted maskray (Data Deficient), Cowtail stingray (Near Threatened) etc. Some of these species are also commonly found as bycatch.

Map 1: Malvan district, Maharashtra

PROJECT OBJECTIVES –

1. Study the post capture survival rate of the shark and ray species that are caught as bycatch.
2. To determine the reproductive biology of those vulnerable shark and ray species.

PROPOSED ACTIVITIES –

The proposed activities involve studying the post capture survival rate by a technique developed by Hueter and Manire (1994) and modified and applied by Braccini et al., in 2012. It involves observing the species caught in the by catch and analysing the conditions of the species and provided by the methodology by Braccini et al., (2012) that classifies the conditions into high, moderate, low and nil. This would be followed by recording measurement of total length, sex, bruises or injury marks. The number of each type of species caught, the type of fishing gear used and the distance at which the bycatch was caught would be recorded. Person's correlation coefficient would determine if there is any correlation between the species and sex to the type of fishing gear used. The other objective involves noting the clasper calcification for males and maximum oocyte diameter, oocyte number and width of the oviductal gland and uteri for females. These would then help determine the maturity of the individuals caught. For pregnant females the total length and number of embryos would be used as the determining factor. Depending on the stage of the reproductive cycle/maturity and seasonality, it can be reasonable to draw possible conclusions to some of the reasons for vulnerability of the species to bycatch.

ANTICIPATED OUTCOMES OF THE PROJECT PROPOSED

The study helps understand which fishing gear, have the most negative impacts on the various shark and ray species. This is to be understood from the post capture survival rates which also depends on their biological conditions and functioning. The capture and handling can result in both physical damage, psychological stress can also significantly affect their survival. Since fishing is a common activity along the coast a study of the bycatch will help understand if unsustainable fishing can actually affect survival and the population size (their numbers). The impact of these different factors can vary not only vary between species, but also between sex and sex and season and some may be exacerbated by poor seas states (Davis, 2002; Moyes et al., 2006). The reproductive study would help understand account for some of the causes for their vulnerability of getting caught in the net.

PROPOSED FOLLOW UP

Conducting the study over several different season to observe if there are any changes. This study also plans to include a pilot study for studying the stress biology of these vulnerable sharks and rays. This would further help understand the biological changes that are associated with getting caught in bycatch and through handling. This can then be extrapolated to understand their post release survival.

INTRODUCTION AND RATIONALE

The study of population connectivity plays a very important role in the understanding the evolutionary and ecological time scales. It is crucial to understand to factors regulating the abundance and distribution of marine organisms. The misconception that marine organisms are abundant in the ocean holds good only for those species that have wide geographical distribution. In case of such widely distributed species, heavy local exploitation rates will not result in the decline of the species because of the expectation that the area will be readily restocked from adjacent populations. There are biological processes that result in lower population connectivity because of a species cosmopolitan distribution (Karl et al., 2010). Subdivided populations as a result of limited dispersal among populations are quite common in coastal species that have complex relationships with their near shore habitats (Heupel et al., 2007). It is therefore important for resource managers and experts to understand the pattern and degree of population subdivision because failure in understanding the population structure can result in over exploitation or localized extirpation (Hueter et al., 2005). In the last few decades, fishing practice has moved into deeper regions of the world's oceans and is no longer restricted to shallow coastal regions (Morato et al., 2006) because of which several chondrichthyans found in deep waters have been exploited (Kyne and Simpfendorfer 2010). As shown by the study conducted by Graham et al., (2001) some of these species have already shown signs of localized declines in abundance.

According to Jabado et al., (2018) Arabian Sea has some of the most threatened population of Chondrichthyan species as it is home to 15% of the described species with 30 endemic species. 78 species have been categorised as Critically Endangered, Endangered or Vulnerable and 27 species have been classified as Near Threatened according to the IUCN Categorisation. 29 species have very little known about them and falls under Data Deficient category. The extinction risk of sharks and rays is high due to low intrinsic population growth rates and also because of the exploitation they face from the fishing industry. The Chondrichthyan population had declined significantly because of uncontrolled and unregulated fishing along with habitat destruction. Apart from incidental catches of sharks (in Arabian Sea) from fisheries targeting other more valuable species (like tuna, shrimp) there is also a growing demand for sharks for food security (Jabado et al., 2018).

One of biggest information gaps with respect to shark and ray species is the movement behaviour. It is critical to understand the movement of species for potential protection measures as that will dictate the size and placement of Marine Protected Areas. Spatial and temporal aggregations need to be studied in order to prevent capture of large numbers of individuals during ecologically important events like mating (Bennett, 2019). Therefore, the present study aims to look at the gene flow and genetic connectivity between the common species of Eastern Indian Coast and Western India Coast in order to determine if there exist any genetic differences between the two (among individuals of same species). Understanding intraspecific population genetic subdivision would help in understanding the differences that exist among individuals of the same species and where they exist/ are abundant which can later on help in designing policies and establishing PAs for better conservation (Taguchi et al., 2005). Maintaining genetic diversity to ensure reproductive fitness and evolutionary potential is critical for ensuring sustainable fisheries, for conservation purposes and to understand the levels of migration among geographic regions and populations. The study looks into demography of the elasmobranch species (sharks and rays). Molecular approaches therefore enable us to determine the pattern and degree of subdivision.

Map of Malvan region of Maharashtra

Map of Vishakhapatnam, Andhra Pradesh

PROJECT OBJECTIVES

The objectives of the project is to –

1. To assess the gene flow and genetic connectivity between common elasmobranch species of the Eastern and Western Coast of India.
2. Demographic studies on the common elasmobranch species.

19 species are common to both the Eastern and Western coast of India which includes – Spotted eagle ray, Scaly whiplay, Ocellated eagle ray, Sharpnose guitarfish, Long tail butterfly ray, Bentfin devil ray, Giant manta ray, Grey bamboo shark, Spottail shark, Blacktip reef shark, Scalloped hammerhead shark etc.

PROPOSED ACITIVITIES

Sample collection and field work will be based out of Malvan (Maharashtra) and Vishakhapatnam (Andhra Pradesh). Fin and tissue samples will be collected from shark and ray species found in the by-catch caught by fishermen. Species that are most commonly caught include the Blue sharks, Bull shark, Whitetip reef shark, Grey reef shark, Giant Manta Ray, Bowmouth guitarfish etc. which are commonly found (out of the above mentioned 19 species) in the by-catches (World Wide Fund for Nature). The genetic analysis of the collected samples will take place in the laboratory in Bangalore. The demographic studies for the species that have been found in the by-catch would also be conducted.

ANTICIPATED OUTCOMES OF THE PROJECT

The analysis of mitochondrial DNA from the samples collected would reveal if the individuals of the same species from the two coastal regions of India are similar or if they are there exists heterozygosity. It would help in understanding if there exists subpopulations of each species or if there is connectivity between the individuals of eastern coast and western coast. The demographic studies on the other hand will help in estimating the number of males, females as well as the number of juveniles and adults that is present in the region.

Sudhakar

PROPOSED FOLLOWUP

The proposed follow up would include conducting genetic studies for all the above mentioned 19 species in order to better understand the connectivity that exists between populations. This would definitely help in better understanding of how Marine Protected Areas could be established, because different subpopulations would require different regions to be protected depending on its abundance, ecology and behaviour. Population growth studies can also be taken up as the time period of 6 months will be sufficient for a mark and recapture technique that would be enable I estimating populations.

BUDGET

Travel expenses to Malvan, Vishakhapatnam and Bangalore – Rs.20,000/- (estimated)

Accommodation – Rs.20,000/- (estimated)

Field and lab work – Rs.10,000/- (estimated)

You are now eligible for being considered by Universities/Institutions in India, for the award of JRF. The validity of the offer is two years from the date of issue of this letter. The commencement of fellowship will depend upon your joining M.Phil./Ph.D. programme. In case you have joined M.Phil./Ph.D. programme prior to the declaration of NET result, you will be eligible to get the fellowship from the date of declaration of NET result, i.e., 15th June, 2012.

It may please be noted that the award of JRF will be made by the Universities/Institutions in accordance with the procedure already communicated to them and not by UGC. You are, therefore, advised to contact the University/Institution in which you have already registered or wish to pursue M.Phil. or Ph.D. for the award of Junior Research Fellowship.

The concerned Institution should verify the original certificates of the candidate. Wherever PH or VH appears in the UGC Ref. No., the relevant documents of Physical or Visual disability should be checked. It should also be verified whether the candidates fulfill the minimum eligibility conditions for Junior Research Fellowship, i.e., at least 55% marks in Master's Degree (or) equivalent examination from a University/Institution recognised by UGC for General/OBC(Non-creamy layer) and 50% for SC/ST/PH/VH candidates within two years from the date of declaration of UGC-NET result.

The candidate should not be more than 28 years of age as on the first day of the month of the concerned UGC-NET (i.e., 01/12/2011), relaxable by five years for SC/ST/OBC(Non-creamy layer)/PH/VH and female candidates. Relaxation in age up to 3 years is provided to candidates who have done LLM and to research scholars for the period of research. Total relaxation on the above ground(s) can not exceed five years.

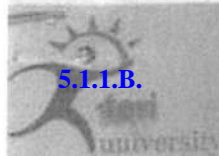

The e-Certificate for lectureship eligibility has already been uploaded on www.ugcnetonline.in.

With best wishes,

Yours faithfully,

Manish has submitted his doctoral synopsis, and he received a CSIR-UGC fellowship throughout most of his doctoral work. The fellowship came to an end in June, 2016. He has published one peer-reviewed journal article and is an excellent experimentalist. Additionally, he has conducted laboratory practicals as part of the M.Sc. Plant Biotechnology programme.
